farmers, their wives and the Extension Branches of Depart ments of Agriculture and agricultural colleges. One variety alone, that of the organization of boys' and girls farm clubs, includes more than 35,000

With regard to schools proper, the total number of schools that would be called agricultural high schools, in the sense that the term "technical high school" is used, is less than a dozen but some of the Provinces provide a great deal of agricultural instruction in the regular courses for school leaving, normal entrance, or matriculation. About one-third of the academic secondary schools in Ontario (collegiate institutes, high, and continuation schools) have agricultural classes. The "ruralization" of teaching in Quebec schools has received emphasis in recent years. Available information however, does not permit of a tabulation that would convey a reliable impression of the extent of agricultural education in the ordinary schools o the several provinces together. There are two residential agricult-tural schools (other than agricultura) colleges) with one or two-year courses in Alberta, one in Ontario, and two in Quebec. They serve much the same purpose as the diploma course in agricultural colleges which are held in one centre in each province, except in Quebec, wher there are three, and in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, where there are none. These boarding schools for the teaching of agriculture remain rare in Canada as compared with some other agriculturinstitutions) with an attendance of 6500 drawn mainly from young people from the farms. The total enrolment in agricultural boarding schools throughout Canada, including the diploma course at agricultural colleges as well as the other five schools, is about 800.
