Berry Mountain's population numbered about 300. The town was isolated from the rest of the world, being located 200 miles up the river from Waynesville and 60 miles from Carter, the nearest settlement.

"During that year, word got around outside that the valley in which the village was located offered better agricultural conditions than any place in the state. And the land was to be had for the askingor the squatting.

"A rush followed and in ten months' time Berry Mountain more than tripled its population. The original settlers were glad of the increase, but the rapidity of growth rather bewildered them. The town lacked stores and churches and the right sort of a government. It lacked other things too, chief among which was schools. And schools, according to Charlie Saunders, were more important than anything else.

" 'The future of Berry Mountain, he said at a public meeting which he F. W. B. FITZGERALD himself called for the purpose, 'deeducate 'em, so that when new settlers come here looking for a place to live they won't think us a bunch of ignorant numbskulls.'

way of talking that impressed men. Before he got through, the gathering was convinced that without school Berry Mountain was destined for a sad ending. Right then and there they appointed a committee, with Charlie as its head, to take the matter under advisement. I was one of those chosen.

"Charlie didn't let any grass grow under his feet. However, the building will be built and if the schoolmarm's pretty enough, and smart enough, she won't have to worry none about her salary. I mean, there'll be plenty who will donate to an education fund just so the little miss wouldn't go hun-

And Charlie despite Joe Wood's assertion that you can't trifle with human nature thataway, promised us he'd be per for Waynesville. The committee, in the interim, had kept themselves busy and had succeeded in collecting enough to not only build a firstrate school house, but a liberal and heating purposes.
