SCHOOL PUPILS' DIFFICULTIES

Bright children cause the schools little worry. They learn lessons readily enough so they are sure to keep up, assuming that they do not get so interested in outside activities that they fall to work.

There are some young students to whom learning is not so easy. Some often fail to understand things they read in books. The printed page makes some heads ache. There is danger that these youngsters will drag behind, and finally get so discouraged that they won't half try.

Teachers devote a great deal of effort to such children. They spend many hours explaining things over and over again. They see possibilities in these little students who are having a hard time climbing up the Hill of Knowledge. The teachers try to give the youngsters such a push that they will at last be able to make the grade.

School courses have to be adjusted to the average pupil. If they are made so easy that the most backward student can learn without difficulty, there is not work enough to keep the bright students busy. So if the lessons are fitted to the average child, some youngsters may have a fairly hard time getting started on the path of learning.

Teachers often find, when consulting with the parents, some difficulty which could be removed. Some families allow their youngsters to do too many things outside of school hours. That reduces the amount of energy the youngster can put into his lessons.

Ambition is the great incentive. The parent is told that if he wants to amount to something in this world, to earn good pay and have a good home, he needs to learn his lessons. The child who lies down and says "It can't be done," is not making good start toward a satisfactory life.

An order of the Dominion government has decreed that all alcohol is to be converted into explosives. Speaking of course, strictly from hearsay, we understand that some of the stuff doesn't need to be converted to produce all the effects of an explosion.—Smith Falls Record-News.
