The SNAPSHOT GUILD

USEFUL TRICKERY

High on a windy hill? Perhaps—but a picture of this type might easily be made in a rocky meadow by shooting from a low position to exclude foreground and background details.

"FAKING" is always an unpleasant word, and yet often a bit of faking or trickery can be used to obtain an interesting pictorial effect—one that wouldn't ordinarily be possible.

For example, consider the picture which accompanies this article. The writer does not know where it was taken, and it probably is a genuine hill-top picture. However, the point is that it could have been made in any meadow or field—wherever there might have been a big rock on which the subjects could pose. You could produce similar results by choosing a low angle of view, and tilting your camera upward so as to exclude all identifying details in the background and foreground. If your subjects were dressed in mountain-climbing garb, the effect would be even more striking.

I want to emphasize that last point, because costumes and similar "stage properties" play a major role in the production of authentic-looking "faked" pictures. For instance, if you show subjects in hunting costume portaging a game through pine woods—any pine grove will do—you'll get the feeling of a North Woods scene. If you show a Naval officer taking a reading with a sextant, you'll get the effect of being on a shipboard—although you may be miles from the nearest water.

Your own ingenuity should provide you with other examples, and you should let it guide you when it comes to working out ideas. One photographer recently pictured a man balancing a stack of eggs on the edge of a table knife held between his teeth. The "eggs" were mere shells, blown empty and strung on a thread that hung from the ceiling, while the subject held the knife so that the bottom egg just touched it.

Try your hand at some of these trick effects. They're fun, and they yield pictures of distinctive novelty and interest. John van Guilder
