and perfect. She became eager. Tomorrow he was returning from Chicago. He would call her. She would meet him as usual. He would present his old argument, expecting her customary reply. Then she would tell him the truth, withholding nothing, admitting the falseness of the barrier that had stood between them.

She smiled, thinking of the expression that would come into his eyes. The telephone rang at five minutes after five. "Meet me at Tony's for dinner. I can hardly wait."

"Of course. I'm glad you're back. It will be fun seeing you again." She was proud that she had been able to keep her voice the same. She arrived early, sat down in the lobby, lighted a cigarette, picked up a magazine. She mustn't let him know at once. He mustn't read it in her eyes.
