Weekly War Commentary

By H. L. JONES
Canadian Press Staff Writer

Less spectacular than the battle for blazing Aachen but not less important in the Allies' grand strategy for bringing about a speedy collapse of Germany is the present 1st Canadian Army operation to reduce the German-held Schelde pocket and make the way open for supply ships to enter the great harbor at Antwerp.

Lt. Gen. Crerar's men are engaged in a triple-bladed thrust at the area south of the Schelde Estuary, which—as long as it is dominated by the enemy—bars use of the vital port.

Antwerp Greatest Prize
At the week-end Canadian troops were fighting hard against the pocketed but stubborn Germans and it appeared the battle may continue for some days. It will be a victory well worth winning. Since it smashed across the Seine and drove into the Low Countries, the 1st Canadian Army has gained for the Allies a number of vital ports—Calais, Boulogne, Dieppe—and has brought Dunkerque under a siege that must end in capitulation of the enemy garrison there soon. But by far the greatest prize for which Crerar's troops have fought is Antwerp.

It is one of the greatest seaports in Europe; and the sooner it is opened by the Allies the sooner Gen. Eisenhower's left wing can be built up to open a drive into Germany by Field Marshal Montgomery's 21st Army Group to match that already launched by Lt.-Gen. Bradley's 12th Army Group at Aachen.

Mighty Air Offensive
The tightly Allied aerial offensive was kept rolling. Swift British Mosquitos hit Cologne and other targets in Western Germany at the week-end to wind up a week of widespread activity. The Germans loosed another buzz-bomb attack on London and southern England during last Friday night but it was not as heavy as previous flying bomb raids during the week.

In the stirring Pacific theatre, Allied air power struck a third blow at the Island of Formosa, which lies 100 miles from the China coast.

German troops on the Greek island of Corfu surrendered. The Nazi garrison on the island lying at the entrance to the Adriatic had been isolated and cut off from their base when Allied forces captured the nearby Albanian port of Sarande. Thus they were starved into surrender.

In Italy the British-American 5th Army captured Monte Bombiana on the road to Bologna. On the other side of the peninsula, the British 8th Army swung into action during the week and made contact with the main German position on the Scolorigossa canal.

Thus the outlook for the Nazis was indeed grim and no group apparently knew it better than the German High Command. Field Marshal Goering made a week-end speech warning the German people that they were fighting for their very existence.

Canadian Gain Ground
By midweek Canadian forces had forced the Germans back to a new defence line in Holland and had completely enveloped the eastern end of the German pocket south of the Schelde Estuary. Canadian infantry entered the town of Ojzendijke which lies six miles south and slightly east of Breskens. Canadian Press War Correspondent Ross Munro reported that the position of the Nazis in the pocket was growing worse daily. It was believed the Germans were short on ammunition.

The Germans in the east, meanwhile, were meeting a great new Russian offensive toward East Prussia. A Berlin broadcast placed the new Russian drive on both sides of the Lithuanian town of Vilkauskis, which lies 12 miles from the central section of the East Prussian border.

Cologne was repeatedly hit from the air as the war in the sky went on. The Germans loosed more flying bombs on southern England and a number of the winged projectiles pierced the British defences, though quite a few were shot down.

In the Pacific, Admiral Nimitz disclosed that 95 Jap planes were shot down out of a total of 191 sent out to intercept an Allied task force which has been pounding Formosa. These Jap losses during the week-end brought to more than 800 total of enemy planes shot down in the first week of the growing Pacific offensive.
