CHILDREN AND BOOKS

Some parents ask what they can do to induce their children to become more obedient. One thing they can do, is to interest their children in reading good books.

There have always been many books that are supposed to constitute a good influence for children. Many of them in past years were fine, but many in the old days were so goody-goody and represented children as such impossible characters, that the modern youngsters would laugh at anything like that.

Plenty of books can be recommended to children which they will like, and which hold fine traits of character up to admiration. They convey the idea that the young person who learns his lessons and plays games squarely and performs kind acts and who co-operates well with community movements, comes out the best and is most apt to draw the prizes.
