DAYLILIES

Both Hemerocallis and Hosta are given the common name of daylily, although in recent years the name of the plantain lily is more generally used for the Hosta. As members of the lily family, they have certain similarities, although the differences far out weigh them.

From the gardener's viewpoint, classification is not as important as the fact that both are dependable, long-living hardy perennials, invaluable for supplying color and contrast in the garden.

Hemerocallis is the more adaptable of the two. It has attained wide popularity as a plant that does well in almost any situation with a minimum of care. It will grow in sun or shade, although in dense shade, bloom will be sparse, and in light or heavy soils provided they are moderately supplied with plant food. Good drainage is essential. In some places the highway department has made liberal use of hemerocallis to cover steep banks in all types of soil. The heavy root systems and clumps of foliage check erosion, and at the same time the broad sweeps of colorful bloom add to the enjoyment of the summer motorist.

Responds to Culture
Yet in spite of the hemerocallis' tolerance, it responds to good culture. Surely the new varieties, whose blossoms rival the true lily in size and loveliness, merit the best we can give them. Daylilies are aristocrats, suitable for the most elaborate formal garden, yet they have a homey quality, which makes them equally desirable in a backyard flower border, in front of shrubs, along drives, on slopes, in meadows, along streams and in open groves. In fact, hemerocallis fits in wherever a spot or a mass of color is needed.

Even when the plants are not in bloom, the gracefully arching foliage fills a void and is a foil for earlier and later blooms. Plant a few clumps by the front gate or a broad drift along the entrance drive for a colorful welcome. The rock garden will benefit by the addition of some of the dainty little dwarf varieties. They bloom from May to September. They range in color from palest cream to deep gold. There are luscious peach, apricot and salmon pinks, brilliant oranges and reds deep maroons and purples, browns mahoganies, some of them solids, others bi-colors or patterned.

Prefer Rich Soil

Hostas, although hardy and enduring, will not take the rough treatment often given hemerocallis. Their preference is for rich, moist but well-drained soil and shade. Despite these differences, hemerocallis and hostas are excellent companions in home grounds landscaping. The hostas' clusters of lily-like flowers in white and shades of lavender and blue, provide what is lacking in the hemerocallis' color range. Moreover, many hostas supply contrast not only with flowers but with foliage as well.

Indeed in many cases the foliage is as ornamental as the flowers. Some hostas have leaves beautifully ruffled and waved and variously splashed or banded with white or cream.

Vacation Bible School Holds Closing Exercise For Parents

The closing session of the Anglican, United and Presbyterian children's summer vacation Bible school was held Friday evening in Knox church, with a large attendance of parents on hand to see 266 children sing and recite.

Rev. J. L. Graham, who led in the devotional period, praised the work of the volunteer women and girls who had led the morning program for two weeks. He termed it the most smoothly run summer school he had ever seen.

The kindergarten group which was directed by Mrs. Robert Mackay displayed their theme "living with home and family". Mrs. J. Dills' primary group displayed items made for the pediatric ward at Milton District Hospital, and Michael Clements sang a solo. Their theme was "love one another."

Mackay thanked those who had led in the school. He also thanked Robin Hood Flour Mills for the donation of soft drinks, and Knight's Cleaners for the donation of cards.
