HOW LONG SHOULD SHOCK ABSORBERS LAST?

Next to brakes the most important safety components of the modern car are undoubtedly the shock absorbers that keep the wheels gripping the pavement and prevent side sway. Yet shock absorbers are often the most neglected of all moving parts requiring intermittent service.

Perhaps because they are out of sight and the driver gets gradually used to the steady decline in their shock absorbing power, shock absorbers are often in astonishingly poor condition on cars otherwise well maintained.

It is foolish for a variety of reasons to neglect your shocks beyond the point where they lose their efficiency. The rough ride shakes your car loose, causing rattles, and your road control over your car goes down tremendously.

Like a rubber ball, tires are bounced off the pavement every time you hit a hole or obstruction. At high speeds, the bounce is of terrific force and puts the tire out of contact with the road for precious moments during which it is out of control. Shock absorbers take the "bounce" out of tires and maintain a constant contact with the pavement. In addition to much greater control, the ride is much smoother with side sway eliminated.

In some cases where a car is driven continuously over rough roads, shocks are worn out at 10,000 miles. At 20,000 it is a pretty safe bet that they should be rebuilt or replaced if they are going to give you the comfort and protection they were intended to render.

MILTON FIREFIGHTERS had an interesting morning Friday, when a man drove up to the fire hall's front door and announced, "My truck is on fire." It was the first time in a long time a fire had been "delivered" to the firefighters. Allied Van Lines driver Bert Huntley had been passing through town with two loads of furniture, and decided to stay overnight at a hotel. In the morning when he started his truck he smelled smoke so he drove it right to the fire hall. The fire, believed to have started in the wiring, ruined most of one party's furniture and damaged part of the other load, causing over $3,000 damage.

Crazy Spud

Inside out, around and about, grew a potato in the Clifford home of Milton Librarian Miss E. Braun.

The potato, one of last year's crop, is budding several new potatoes out of last year's skin.

The odd potato is on display in a Champion office window.
