The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth about home heating.

Are you confused about home heating fuels? What with everybody and his brother telling you how economical, convenient, quiet and automatic his particular system is, you must feel like flying south for the winter. But if you have to stay and face a cold, hard winter (like most of us) better read these cold, hard facts.

Wood and coal are probably the most economical fuels to buy—but they're also the least efficient. And sooner or later you'll get tired of slaving over a dirty furnace—then what?

You can choose between a liquid fuel or so-called "flameless" heating. Or natural gas. All of them claim to be the best. Who should you believe?

Initial installation costs are higher for liquid fuel equipment than for gas. A gas unit has fewer moving parts, needs less maintenance and therefore lasts longer. In order for "flameless" heating to compete in operating cost, it requires extra-thick insulation throughout the home.

If your home had extra-thick insulation, no matter what kind of heating system you use, you'd naturally cut fuel costs. With extra insulation or normal insulation, a gas heating system means lower fuel costs by far.

You never have to order natural gas—it's always there. A good, old-fashioned Canadian snowstorm can't stop natural gas from heating your home. Storms can stop trucks. They can also knock out power lines—and very often do. Unless you have your own generator, "flameless" heating can give you the cold shoulder, just when you need a warm house. Let's face it—nothing is as dependable as natural gas.

With modern gas heating there are no hot and cold "layers" of stale air. Dust and dirt particles can be filtered from the air and humidity controlled. Wouldn't you rather have a heating system that took care of these vital functions?

When you get right down to it, modern automatic gas heating has the edge in just about every department. But if you're still not convinced, maybe this will help; if you install a gas conversion burner in your existing furnace now, or even install a brand-new gas design furnace.

What's more, we'll spread out the cost of the installation in easy monthly payments—over 5 years if need be. Unless you know someone who'll chop your wood for free, you won't get a better deal than this—anywhere! Why not make the switch to natural gas heating right now.
