Sugar and Spice . . .
boys in the white coats.

There's the student who tries the shot-gun approach. Scatter your gems as widely as possible, and you're bound to hit something right. One such, in a recent history exam, identified John D. Rockefeller thus: "He was a Prime Minister of England and very important in the labor movement." The rumble heard at the time was John D. trying to argue his way back to this world so he could strangle the kid.

Sometimes it's not funny. On a recent exam, junior students were asked to pick the right verb from this sentence: "They have (drunk, drank) all the water." A little blonde girl with troubled eyes chose "drank" because, as she pointed out, "Drunk is not a verb. It's a noun." She had good reason for her answer. Her father is one.

And then, of course, amid the welter of confusion, comes the sudden stab of pure, refreshing delight, the discovery of an original, perceptive mind, trying to make sense out of all this nonsense. It's like finding a solid piece of ground in a swamp, a cool spring in the desert.

That's the moment when the poor old teacher is hooked once again by that most irritating of nuisances, faith in the future of the human race. And bleary-eyed, but with a lighter heart, he bows his weary head once more over the wasteland of words, looking for the diamond in the coal-mine.

STAY AWAY

If you catch a cold, keep away from other people, especially young children and infants. When sneezing or coughing, the mouth should be covered with a disposable tissue. Staying in bed and drinking plenty of milk, water and fruit juices will help to get rid of the condition.
