

AUSTRALIAN WORKERS MAY STRIKE

Australian trade unions are threatening to strike unless the alleged high lead levels are controlled at Rio Tinto Zinc's lead smelter near Newcastle, New South Wales. Australian workers claim that the results from their blood tests have not been revealed. A government inquiry is planning to study the problem soon.

LASER SYSTEM DETECTS OIL SLICKS

An airborne system, called laser fluorosensor, has been developed at the University of Toronto to detect ships dumping oil into the water at night. The laser emits ultraviolet light which excites molecules of oil, causing changes in wavelength, which makes the light that is reflected back another color. It is estimated that useful signals can be obtained from a plane flying 2,000 to 3,000 ft. high. The system has many potential applications, including water quality control.
