More spent on gum than politics - O'Connor

In a recent speech to the House of Commons on the government's proposed election expenses limitation bill, Halton MP Terry O'Connor attacked lack of public support for political parties and made recommendations concerning disclosure of campaign donations to remedy the problem.

He said, "It is a painful fact of everyday life that parties and candidates are poor," and called the priority Canadians have for financially assisting them "incredibly low".

"It has been noted that Canadians spend more on chewing gum each year than on support of their political party," Mr. O'Connor pointed out.

Private is best
Wary of public subsidies to candidates, the Halton MP said, "Private financing of parties and candidates is still the most desirable method of funding our system. The system should encourage each person to exercise his choice, by means of a private donation, and it should not tend to relieve him of this choice, by means of overemphasis on public funding. A system of public funding takes the freedom of choice of support away from the individual and requires him to support all parties including those with whose philosophy he may strongly disagree."

To alleviate public suspicion of governmental patronage to donors, Mr. O'Connor says disclosure regulations must be more strict. They should also encourage more public interest — "The disclosure requirements, together with tax incentives to small donors, should achieve the fundamental objective of broadening the base of political support. Disclosure will engender confidence in the public that parties and candidates are not controlled or bought by a few large donors but are in fact supported by many thousands of small and medium sized donors."

Mr. O'Connor also criticized Liberal party efforts to solicit campaign funds from American parent firms operating Canadian subsidiaries. He called such action odious and said they erode the confidence of Canadians in their political system.
