leather, drove noisy motorcycles and were into loud music, while the Mods were into swamp jackets, desert boots, motorscooters and the New Wave music of the time. One of the more interesting details of Quadrophenia is viewing the fashions of the early sixties.

Further in a continuing series of movies that examine the sixties, The Who's Quadrophenia is inspired by, and based on their 1973 album of the same name.

Quadrophenia chronicles the Mod versus Rocker confrontations at Brighton, England in 1964, through the experiences of a Mod named Jimmy Strange that no one made a movie of this phenomena sooner.

Just to refresh your memory, Mods and Rockers were disparate manifestations of desperation felt by British working-class youth. The Rockers wore black Quadrophenia is primarily cast with unknowns. Jimmy, our youthful anti-hero, is convincingly played by Phil Daniels. He likes to drive his Lambretta, pop pills and do the Watusi. Sting (of The Police), as The Ace, a blonde bell-boy, strikes some interesting poses as the uncrowned king of the Mods.

With The Who, (Roger Daltrey, John Entistle, Pete Townshend), acting as musical directors and executive producers, Quadrophenia is produced by film-maker Roy Baire and The Who's manager, Bill Curbishley. The director is Franc Roddam.

It is interesting to observe, once more, that the British have a different attitude toward nudity. This movie offers only male nudity and it is obviously not present to titillate.
