Economy recovering

"We should keep advertising so that people know we are here," he said.

"Our natural advantages will put us in good stead when people do get the confidence back to make the major investments that they are only thinking about now."

"I'm not even sure that a change in government will help us. What we need more than anything else right now is a period of stability," he added.

"The balance of our economy here is so diversified . . . that we haven't felt the weight of the major layoffs and closures that other areas have," he said.

"A lot of businesses aren't making much money right now, but they are certainly hanging on and that's good," he said, adding that when the current recession does end the businesses that survive will be better able to expand.

"We were fat and sloppy in many of our businesses, but now we are fit and lean and these businesses have learned to run efficiently," he said.

Until national forces cause the economy to turn around entirely, he said, there isn't much
