Quebec divides candidates

Halton federal rivals state their positions

By BRAD REAUME

The Champion

National party leaders were scheduled to resume their French language debate Sunday night to discuss the Quebec question. The debate was halted Tuesday when the moderator fainted.

"Other issues are being pushed aside and we're back to Quebec," said Halton Reform candidate Rick Malboeuf, a self-described francophone Quebecker. "It's time to resolve the issue once and for all. I want a united Canada. This is hurting all of Canada's economy, not just Quebec."

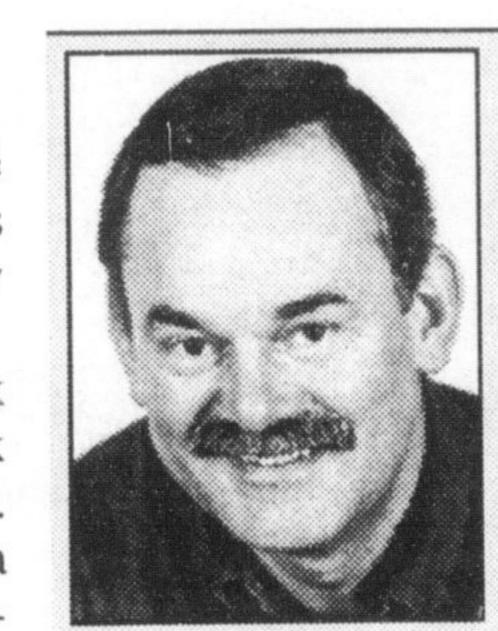

Mr. Malboeuf said Reform would enact a number of measures which would bolster provincial powers equally. He pointed out that the majority of Canadians have already rejected distinct society through the defeat of the Charlottetown Accord in 1992.

Liberal candidate Julian Reed said the government's position has been consistent. He said it is based on four fundamentals; celebration of Canada's success, modifications to government through non-constitutional changes, recognition of all groups in the Canadian family and the need for all regions to approve of any constitutional changes.

"It is nonsense that Canada came close to splitting over the last referendum," said Mr. Reed. "It was just a referendum, a snapshot of the moment, and it was non-binding."

Mr. Reed said the Liberal government would confer distinct society status on Quebec to recognize what already exists. He pointed to Quebec's civil law and French language, saying they were protected by England's King George III.

"If you travel Canada, the first thing you recognize is how bloody big it is, the second is the cultural differences," said Mr. Reed. "We have to reach out to one another. I'm bullish on the future of Canada. I think we are already seeing the cracks in the separatist cause."

"Where was Preston Manning during that referendum? He didn't appear to care."

RALPH SCHOLTENS

Mr. Reed said Reform is not a national party and has no intention of trying to be that. He also said much of the current problem can be traced to the Progressive Conservative government, which gave many of the separatists prominent positions.

Progressive Conservative candidate Ralph Scholtens said Prime Minister Jean Chretien was frozen during the last referendum and said nothing other than 'stay the course' on a rapidly sinking ship.

"Where was Preston Manning during that referendum?" Mr. Scholtens asked. "He didn't appear to care. However, (PC leader) Jean Charest gave a passionate, passionate speech in Montreal and saved the country. It's clear who the real leader is."

Mr. Scholtens said Mr. Manning's Reform Party does not respect the distinctions in Quebec. He said Reform's 20-point plan for Quebec is a plan to break up the country.

"You have to remember the Canadian federation was originally an economic union," said Mr. Scholtens.

"There is much that can be talked about with Quebec that isn't constitutional. Reform's tough talk has financial repercussions.

New Democratic Party candidate Jay Jackson and Green Party candidate Bill Champ were not available for comment at press time.
