and another for economic development.

"The stage is set. We are getting closer and closer to the growth mode. Growth won't be a piece of cake but it is staged and phased and can be managed properly."

Upon returning to town five years hence he expects to see new subdivisions and a bit of a different character to Milton.

In response to recent criticism from business groups about the planned easterly expansion of town prior to a western thrust, Mr. Hipgrave played down the consequences of the initial growth pattern.

"There shouldn't be a concern about where growth occurs. There will still be development to the west and downtown will still be the core. We tried to avoid the huge growth."

Mr. Hipgrave said his five years in Milton were marked by constant policy changes from the provincial government. First the NDP brought in the social contract and expenditure control plan, which was the beginning of reduced provincial grants, he noted.

The Tory government came in with a whole new agenda, he explained, including a reorganization of program and financial responsibilities under Who Does What. In addition there are plans for a Greater Toronto Services Board and a review of local services under the HASR.

"(Who Does What) did not turn out the way it was planned in some ways," said Mr. Hipgrave. "I think it's a first step in an ongoing process. So far it's not as clean as was hoped but there were some good strides made."
