vide an intense security block."

Supervising political rallies and making vehicle checks for weapons have become routine for the soldier, whose teenage years in the Lorne Scot Reserves paved the way to his current peacekeeping assignment.

With the possibility of violence ever present in war-torn Bosnia, he and his platoon mates are always on call and can't have more than two alcoholic drinks per day, even when they're not on active duty.

Private Herder explained that most Muslims, who comprise the majority of the population around his camp, have been receptive of the Canadian troops — but not all.

"We get some people who give us the finger and tell us to go home. You just try not to let it bother you, which isn't that hard when so many more of them are generally understanding."

Private Herder said it's the widespread poverty and destruction for which he was least prepared.

"Sometimes it's just so hard to believe how bad it is, particularly since the fighting ended two years ago. It's really made me appreciate how good we've got it in Canada," he said.

Snowboards hot items

That scenario is inviting to thieves, who can easily walk off with pricey snowboards and sell them cheaply, she said.

Equipment thefts are an annual problem at Glen Eden and other ski areas, but the current popularity of snowboarding has created an underground market, said Bob Edmondson, director of corporate support services for the Halton Region Conservation Authority, which operates the facility.

"We just ask people to lock up their skis and boards, and if anyone sees one (outside the chalet) and they don't know where it came from, please ask about it," Mr. Edmondson said.
