Protect Yourself From Carbon Monoxide

(IBOC)—How do you protect yourself against a poison you can't see, can't smell, and can't taste? Carbon monoxide poisoning can sneak up on you. At best, it can make you pretty sick...at worst it can be fatal. But there are symptoms you can watch out for or, better yet, there are ways to reduce the odds you'll be exposed to carbon monoxide in the first place. At home, carbon monoxide is produced naturally through your furnace operation. Small amounts of this gas won't harm you, and will exit the home through normal ventilation. What you want to avoid is a buildup of this gas, especially because you can't be sure you're breathing it. Do all you can to let carbon monoxide make the great escape. • That means keeping your chimney clear, so the gas has some way to leave the home. • It means keeping your furnace in a good state of repair; poorly maintained furnaces don't allow enough air for full combustion, which produces higher levels of carbon monoxide. • It means not sealing your home like a jar of preserves during the winter. There's nothing wrong with being energy efficient, but you still need some air circulation.

• Your car also generates carbon monoxide. If you leave it idling with windows open, you could also be letting in high amounts of this poison. Then, when you roll the windows back up, the gas has nowhere to go.

• Though you can't tell if carbon monoxide is in the air, you will start to notice some symptoms of carbon monoxide poisoning: headaches, a tight forehead, dizziness and nausea, a loss of muscular control, and watery or smarting eyes.

• Those conditions can always be symptoms of another kind of illness. But if you feel any of them, get some fresh air by opening windows or doors or by stepping outside. If carbon monoxide was the problem, the symptoms should clear up.
