And there are other costs to deal with. "That clinic needs furniture, it needs computers," said Dr. Nosal. To cope, Halton staff have even advised running a deficit at the clinic.

Halton Hills Councillor John Day wondered if the province could be put on notice of the situation while the clinic runs a deficit. And he asked that other agencies be brought in to lobby the Province for help.

Mental health clinics in other areas are also suffering from a critical cash shortage, acknowledged Halton CAO Brent Marshall.

He asked for time to approach organizations such as the Associations of Municipalities of Ontario (AMO) to gauge its concern about the issue.

Last Wednesday, Council voted to bring the issue to the next Regional Mayors and Chairs meeting, and to schedule a meeting with the Ministry to lobby for funding.

AMO is currently sorting through funding issues in a host of areas, said Oakville Mayor and AMO president Ann Mulvale.

A rush for clinic services is the inevitable fallout of years of government policies, said Halton Chair Joyce Savoline.
