

Main St. business owners say construction crews courteous

"The DBIA, the Region and the Town have been working together very positively. There's a lot of positive energy happening."

Construction crews have proven courteous as well, explained Anita Mangotich, owner of Halton Hills Fine Jewelry (formerly Gold Connection).

"A lady came by Tuesday and she had her walker. They (construction workers) stopped everything (sidewalk removal and replacement) and let that lady come in. And when she went out, they stopped everything to let her out and made sure she was okay. I thought it was so nice, so polite."

Merchants have also expressed satisfaction with the way in which the construction is taking place — leaving store access open at all times.

"They're not even leaving big messes around or anything. We're quite impressed," commented JoAnne McCann, co-owner of Jo'leen's Clothing for Women.

Overall, Main Street businesses appear optimistic about both the construction and the end result.

"I think it'll be outstanding. I think most of us were pretty sad to see the trees go, but that's just something that had to be done to accomplish the final goal," said Mr. MacKay.

"I'm quite in favour of it (re-construction). I think the couple months of inconvenience will be quite worth while."

Along with the removal of the trees went the miniature tree lights seen brightening the street each evening. But they'll be making a return as soon as construction is complete and new trees are in place, said Ms Garrard.

"A lot of people have asked about that."
