years but I experienced a lot during that time."

He said he chose to volunteer as a pilot with the air force because it was the "glory" job. "The pilot had to know what his crew was doing at all times."

Although Mr. Walton didn't travel overseas, it didn't mean he was sheltered from tough times.

One of the guys he signed up for the war with died in battle. Still relatively young, it was his first time travelling alone to unfamiliar territory — and the first time he left Ontario.

And spending Christmas away from his family was also tough to swallow.

"We never talk about the hardships. We don't give play to the serious side."

Mr. Walton said he's attended — and even participated in — the annual Remembrance Day ceremonies held November 11.

"I think having Remembrance Day is fantastic. It's not just for the veterans of the Second World War, but the First (World War) and the Korean War. Canada was very military during World War II. It was the glory years for Canada."

As part of the 60th anniversary of the British Commonwealth Training Plan in 2000, Mr. Walton flew a 242 RCAF plane over the Parliament building in Ottawa along with pilots from the Canada Harvard Aircraft Association.

The ceremony was held in recognition of air crew who were allies to Canada and who also trained in the country.
