No Halton residents under quarantine for SARS

By JASON MISNER

The Champion

The threat of severe acute respiratory syndrome is on the decline in Halton.

Halton's Medical Officer of Health Dr. Bob Nosal said there are now no Halton residents under voluntary quarantine.

That's the first time the Region can say that since the end of March, when the first group of Halton residents were quarantined.

Interest

It should help spell some much-needed relief for the public health department. which has been working overtime analyzing, documenting and monitoring the condition of residents who feared they might have SARS.

Quarantine has been used as a precautionary measure for people who may have been exposed to SARS symptoms by a potentially-infected person. Or, those quarantined had been at a hospital where the pneumonia-like illness — which can be deadly — was prevalent.

Because the SARS situation is improving, the Region has seen a drop in the number of SARS-related phone calls.

That means its SARS hotline is now operating during normal business hours, Monday to Friday, from 8:30 a.m. until 4:30 p.m.

Up until Monday, the hotline was in effect during evening hours and on the weekends.

A total of 1,300 calls have been made since it was set up.

Anyone who thinks they're showing SARS symptoms are asked to call Telehealth Ontario at 1-866-797-0000.

In Halton, a total of about 150 people have been quarantined and cleared from potentially having SARS.

That number includes two suspect cases the Region's health department had been monitoring.

A female Burlington resident — a Mount Sinai nurse — remains in a Toronto hospital as a probable case of SARS.

Fear and anger among the public boiled over after it was discovered she rode GO trains earlier this month while showing some SARS symptoms.

Reassuring news is there have been no suspect or probable cases reported among passengers who rode on the same train as the nurse, Dr. Nosal said.

So far SARS has been implicated in the deaths of 21 people, all of them from the Toronto area.

But Ontario's top public health officials are feeling hopeful that the SARS outbreak is on the slide as the number of cases continue to drop daily.

Two full incubation periods, or 20 days, have passed since the last reported case of community-spread SARS.

Much to the relief of Toronto politicians and businesses, the World Health Organization (WHO) — lifted its travel advisory on people travelling to the Big Smoke. The WHO believes SARS transmissions have stopped completely in Canada.

Halton Healthcare Services, which includes Oakville-Trafaglar Memorial and Milton District hospitals, have, with approval from the Ministry of Health, already relaxed some of their stringent protocols, including allowing some visitors at certain times of the day.

Members of the public are encouraged to call the Halton Healthcare Services hotline at (905) 815-5123 or log on to its Web site at www.haltonhealthcare.com for additional information.
