

Spence to be an art mentor

• from SHE on page B1
she's constantly trying out something new. Often she'll venture to the craft supply store and buy an item just because it looks interesting.

But with that adventurous nature comes near misses and a few creative disasters, some of them involving gluing herself to various pieces of furniture.

"I have large bottles of nail polish remover around for large projects I might get stuck on," she said with her characteristic laugh. "I've developed a good respect for glue guns the hard way."

This winter, Ms Spence will be involved as an art mentor with a new program that's forming in Milton called Sparks of Brilliance.

"It's a group of artists and mentors who want to bring art to people who are underprivileged," she explained.

Whether it's an elderly person who can't get to a store for art supplies, a child who can't afford them or someone who spends most of his time sick in bed, the group hopes to brighten lives through creating.

It's a concept that makes sense to Ms Spence, since she's personally experienced art's therapeutic nature.

"It takes my mind away from any little things," she said, explaining her worries disappear once she picks up a piece of clay or a paint brush.
