

Council approves Derry Rd. expansion

Regional council authorized the much-anticipated Derry Road expansion from Bronte Street to James Snow Parkway at its meeting Wednesday.

Council passed a bylaw to make way for reconstructing and widening the stretch from two lanes to four. The work will also include putting traffic lights in place at every intersection except for Fourth Line and Farmstead Drive and installing a concrete median that will be landscaped with trees in some parts.

An asphalt multi-use path will also run almost the full length of the road between James Snow and Bronte.

Other aspects of the project include creating left turn lanes at every intersection, except for Fourth Line, leaving breaks in the centre median for access to businesses and installing more street lights.

The Region expects to keep Derry Road open during construction, but some detours will be set up.

The project is anticipated to cost about $18 million and is scheduled to start in July. Work is expected to be finished by summer, 2006.

Environmental assessment study for Derry Rd. now in second stage

Within a few years, local residents could see Derry Road between Bronte Street and Tremaine Road double in size.

Taking this section of road from two lanes to four was part of the preliminary "preferred alternative" put forward by planners at an open house held on the project May 4.

Halton Senior Transportation Co-ordinator Nick Zervos presented information at the meeting from the environmental assessment study being completed on the stretch of road.

The study is in its second phase where alternatives to meet the road's future traffic needs are identified and evaluated, such as providing improved transit service, improving other roadways in the area, widening from two lanes to four and doing nothing.

Mr. Zervos said widening and using a combination of other alternatives like a rail grade separation — more commonly known as a railway underpass or overpass — will be recommended as the "preferred solution" for the project.

He noted the Halton Transportation Master Plan identified the need for widening the road from two lanes to four by 2011.

The project is in the Region's capital budget in 2009, when construction could start.

Mr. Zervos said the road work is expected to cost about $5 million. A new water-main is also part of the project, which could cost around $1.4 million.

A second open house on the project will be held in September.
