said the production is for everyone.

"I personally believe it could put a smile on anyone's face," she said.

This will be Danielle's debut on stage with the group, taking on the roles of Mrs. Otter, Old Mother Nature and Old Mother West Wind. But she's no newcomer to the stage, having performed for years in school productions.

Although this play is based on the stories of an author long gone, Danielle said the group added a bit of flair, "making them (stories) more fun."

Morals include "Be happy with the things you have, and don't want what someone else has," she said.

Danielle couldn't say enough about Mr. Croezen.

"Rob's amazing," she said. "He's an incredible director. He's a big kid at heart."

Acting is a true passion of Danielle's because of the opportunities it affords.

"I love the fact it gives me the chance to be different people. When else would I have the chance to be Mother Nature or an otter?"

Steve Bevers, 21, is the oldest actor in the group, and the only original member left. He joined in grade 10 and never looked back.

"I like doing this for fun. It's where I started and where I have my roots," he said.

The college student said he's always open to coming home for rehearsals when a production's approaching.

"It's really like a tight-knit family. There are a lot of people who have been there for at least four or five years."

For this production, Mr. Bevers has taken on the part of the narrator.

"Even though it's not an active role, it's still fun. You don't always have to be a wild and crazy character."

Unfortunately, over the years the theatre group hasn't gotten much recognition around town as it would like — although members of St. Paul's United Church have always been extremely supportive, Mr. Bevers said.

"It doesn't seem like a lot of people want to take the time to come and check us out," he said. "It's kind of disheartening."

Mr. Croezen said people seem to be hesitant about giving their time and money to see a play performed by youngsters.

He wants people to know this group performs at a high caliber.

"I challenge them at a high level and they come through," he said.

Tickets are available at the door or in advance at the church office Monday to Friday. For more information, call (905) 878-8895.
