

Interesting finding about town parking permits

they're just moving their car to a different place on the street.

There's a provision to apply for a temporary parking permit, which you can do by telephone or on-line. It's not a permanent solution because you're only allowed a maximum of 18 of those considerations per year, but it's something.

Okay now, here's the kicker. You could spend all day looking through the Milton Web site at www.milton.ca, which is very thorough, but I was going through the bylaws and reports for parking and found something interesting.

In 2003, a report showed that streets were allowed to apply for relief from the three-hour parking restrictions. There were 19 requests for this, so the Town sent out questionnaires to all the residents on each of the streets. Approval for the exemption would require that 51 percent of those surveyed on the street (one response per household) be in support.

There may have been other things that have happened since — I didn't have two weeks to go through the reports — but get this, not one of the streets approved the extended parking.

So, don't blame the local government because you can't park your car on the street overnight, blame yourselves, or at least your neighbours. You don't want it.
