Artist most proud of her Faubert award

Newlove's 'Memory Girl' was on display at the Main Street Inn in Georgetown recently.

Over the years, Newlove has received many awards, but she is most proud of one accomplishment: the Frank Faubert Memorial Award for Art in 2005 and City of Toronto Purchase Award. Her piece is now in the city's permanent collection.

"Her work is important because it's not just visually beautiful. There's a depth of feeling, a depth of understanding that connects with the viewer in different ways," said Rose Anne.

In 1997, at the age of 24, Newlove was the youngest artist asked to join the Arts and Letters Club of Toronto.

Newlove gets a great sense of satisfaction from doing benefit work. One of her ventures was travelling to Pristina, Kosovo in 1999, with a band called Tribe of One to perform in a benefit concert for the returning refugees. Newlove painted on stage while the band and dancers performed, drawing on the energy that came from the music, which in turn, affected her brush strokes as she worked to the beat of the music.

The artist usually tried to finish a painting during a concert and sell it to the guests at the end of the night. "People are still totally interested in watching a blank canvas kind of transform, even as it goes through different stages," said Newlove.

Newlove's first venture into this type of performance art with the band was back in 1998, when they traveled to Winkler, Manitoba to play for a small Mennonite community. She also spent a summer with the band, traveling across Canada. She painted on one large board, which was transported from venue to venue.

More recently, Newlove was involved with the Concert For Peace (Artists For A Better World) event held at Mel Lastman Square at the end of July of this year. Newlove also paints with her husband, Andrew Hendriks, who is a disc jockey. She looks forward to being involved with more benefit concerts.
