Foster care shortage addressed

Major recruitment campaign launched

Child protection agencies across south-central Ontario, including the Children's Aid Society of Halton, have come together to respond to the critical shortage of foster parents.

Under the Homes for Kids banner, the agencies have joined forces and launched a major recruitment campaign dubbed 'There Are Lots of Kids Like Me'.

The initiative focuses on both the volume and diversity of children in need of safe and caring homes. In Halton, Hamilton, Niagara, Brant, Haldimand and Norfolk, more than 3,000 children aged 0 to 18 are in the collective care of six agencies.

"We are working collectively with our sister agencies to deliver the strongest message this region has ever seen," said Rafiat Lawal, foster home recruiter at The Children's Aid Society of Halton.

"There are hundreds of vulnerable children right here in our region who are in need of safe and caring homes. I truly believe that once people realize that we are in dire need of homes for our kids, we will see a surge in the number of foster families available to these children."

The agencies' objective is to blanket the region with the message that safe homes are needed urgently for hundreds of children and youth throughout south-central Ontario. In order to meet the diverse needs of children in care, the campaign also conveys the message that foster parents are needed from all cultural, ethnic and religious backgrounds.

The campaign marks the first time the region has seen a joint approach to foster parent recruitment, involving both broadcast and print media. In addition to a series of high-impact radio and television commercials, the campaign also features newspaper ads and posters.
