Fighter keeping busy with his acting career

with far less breathing room compared to kickboxing, the traditional stand-up local fighter had to summon about as much intensity and desire as he ever had to break free of his grappling-oriented foe early on.

Once able to keep things at a vertical base — thanks to some effective defence — Cyr had the clear-cut edge.

Recalled the former kickboxing star, "He caught me with some glancing blows, but nothing too serious, and I could tell he was getting winded."

While putting martial arts competition aside for several years, Cyr has hardly been inactive.

In addition to keeping up training — albeit on a scaled back level — he's kept awfully busy with a steadily-expanding acting career (spawn from his martial arts background, though no longer including those types of roles) and his own construction business.

While mixed martial arts is a more all-purpose form of combat compared to kickboxing — often featuring as much ground attack as straight away assaults — Cyr stressed that there's one main, and rather obvious, similarity between the two.

"In either one you've got to be able to tune out the pain," he explained. "Getting started in kung fu in my late teens, I had an ex-military instructor that really helped with that. Now it (pain) just doesn't register with me."

So now that the local fighter has had a taste of mixed martial arts, will he be going back for another helping anytime soon?

"Definitely. I wanted to prove I could do this before I got too old and I've just started to do that. I've got another fight planned for June, and if I win that it should open the door to one in Las Vegas."
