Police board seeks funds to hire

The Halton Regional Police Services Board voted to request funds from the newly-established Police Officers Recruitment Fund last week in hopes the money will be enough to hire five more officers for the region.

The federal government established the fund when the budget was announced in February to allow provinces and territories to participate in a national effort to recruit 2,500 front-line police officers over five years.

Ontario received $156 million from this fund, with $78 million going toward new OPP officers, $20 million for the hiring of new officers for First Nations police services and $58 million going towards the hiring of new municipal officers.

The board is looking to get part of that $58 million for municipal officers, noting they will need a total of $350,000 to hire the five new officers.

The police recruitment funds could help Halton, as 51 officers are currently eligible for retirement with another 41 reaching that eligibility between now and 2012.

The request will go before the Region for approval before making its way to the federal government.
