Fulfills many commercial and personal trucking needs

offering a Gross Combined Weight Rating of 9500 lbs (4309 kg), the greatest towing capacity in Mazda's lineup. There is a pump penalty for that power, with my tester being the least fuel-efficient at this top end of the lineup in 4X4 rig, rated at 15.2/11.3L/100km (city/hwy), numbers in keeping with my personal average of 15.7L/100km.

Inside, there's room for two, possibly three on the front bench.

"Looks just like my Dad's old Ranger," one friend told me and, indeed, there's been little in the way of styling change inside or out to this fourth-generation version, although a few modern touches have been added like a carbon-fibre style centre stack treatment, standard tire pressure monitoring system and an iPod/MP3 player input jack. Behind the front seat, the extended cab area offers extra storage room and two jump seats that flop down sideways with lap belts and without headrests. Those seats might come in handy in a pinch (and I do mean PINCH) but the area would be better suited for grocery bags, toolbox storage or maybe even as a spot for the family dog.

In back, the standard six-foot box offers four tie-down hooks and a gross payload rating of 572 kg (1,260 lbs).

Ford Ranger sales have picked up in the last few years with increasing fuel costs, despite the "bigger is better" domestic malaise that has suborned the original fuel-efficiency intent of vehicles like this. And as goes the Ford Ranger, so goes the Mazda B-Series, so the models have managed to hold on over the years. But its future is uncertain with rumours swirling. Will the lineup be terminated or will there be a unibody replacement? Present financial problems have made model futures and changes even more uncertain.

But I enjoyed driving the B4000. Much as I would prefer four-cylinder fuel economy mated to 4X4 all-weather security, the B4000 offered plain, simple and honest performance and capability in a no-nonsense package.

That combination of throw-it-in-the-back utility and an economy car-style starting price has kept the Mazda B-Series in the marketplace as an alternative for Mazda customers, and an appealing entry level model fulfilling many commercial or personal trucking needs.
