Quarter of eligible Catholic girls get vaccine

By Tim Foran
CANADIAN CHAMPION STAFF

Only about a quarter of all eligible Grade 8 girls in Halton's English Catholic schools in the last school year started a vaccination program that combats a leading cause of cervical cancer, according to a staff report reviewed by regional council's health committee Tuesday.

That's about 35 per cent less than the uptake of the vaccine by Grade 8 girls at both Halton's public and French Catholic schools, according to Regional staff.

It's also a 10 per cent drop from the percentage of English Catholic Grade 8 girls who received the vaccine the previous school year of 2007-08, according to the report. The vaccine, which protects against two strains of HPV that cause 70 per cent of cervical cancer cases, is optional and requires parental consent.

"It is very likely the reason for the decrease is the fact we couldn't get into the schools," Halton Medical Officer of Health Dr. Bob Nosal said in an interview following the health committee meeting.

Nosal was referring to a decision made by the Halton Catholic District School Board (HCDSB) in June, 2008, when five of the board's nine trustees voted to stop allowing the health department to administer the vaccine, called Gardasil, at its schools.

"The discussion focused on the importance of our board to sustain and promote a school system as a
