

Program holds youths accountable

• from YOUTH on page A9
needs to be done to make it right.

When it's necessary, Pomeroy said, police work hand in hand with agencies including Transitions for Youth and the Reach Out Centre for Kids in the community that can be of help to the youth.

For example, a youth who is caught shoplifting would be referred to the Elizabeth Fry society, which has a program for shoplifters. A youth who is addicted to marijuana would be referred to ADAPT.

Pomeroy said they also speak with the victim, let them know the youth is in the program and get their input on what they would like to see happen.

Part of the contract can include writing a letter of apology to the victim. Some of the youths themselves suggest they do this.

DaRosa said when they are determining a youth's community service hours they try to get the youth to find his or her own hours.

"We want the youth to be successful," he said.

Working with the program has been a "huge eye opener" for DaRosa.

"It's changed my perspective of policing," he said. "It (the program) will be the first thing on my list (when he's back policing on the street). It's highly successful. I did use it before, but maybe not as much as I should have."
