Golf tips
By George Tidd, director of golf, Hidden Lake Golf and Country Club

The short game

The problem at most driving ranges is the lack of chipping, pitching and putting greens. Ranges are geared more to the person who just wants to hammer out a bucket of balls. Most golfers would rather beat golf balls.

Chipping and putting just aren't as much fun. Generally the better golfers realize the importance of the short game and will find time to chip and putt.

The best players in the world shoot par or better most of the time. One half of all the shots they take on the golf course will be chips or putts. At least one half of all their practice time will be spent on the short game.

The average male golfer in North America shoots just over 100. One half of all shots he takes on the golf course will be chips or putts. Yet, almost all of the little bit of time the average golfer devotes to practice will be spent beating balls. Very little, or none on the short game.

Proper chipping technique is not difficult to master but there are a few fundamentals you must follow. Get a couple of short lessons first thing in the season.

Putting is a different story. Some people seem to be born with that touch on the green. Others are constantly struggling. This is the most personalized area of the game.

There are as many putting styles as there are styles of putters. You must find a putter and a style for you. However, there are a few things that all good putters do in common. Get some help from your pro.

When it comes to choosing a putter, never, never buy a putter without hitting some putts on the green. For some reason the putter will look entirely different in the Pro Shop than it looks on the putting green.
