Don Miller, owner of Don Miller Enterprises, is shown with just a few of the first-aid products he sells to home, business and industry.

Ambulance volunteer has created
Milton's first aid supply depot

By JIM ROBINSON
Champion Reporter

About five years ago, Don Miller was teaching a St. John Ambulance course when someone asked him for a first-aid kit similar to that belonging to St. John Ambulance.

A day later, someone else wanted to buy a car-size, first-aid kit for his father.

"I used to direct them to the biggies (large firms) in Toronto or Hamilton," he said, "until I said to myself one day that perhaps I could provide first-aid supplies and kits to Milton."

That was five years ago and today Don Miller Enterprises operates from his basement. He packs in two telephones, a desk, a wall full of honours for his community, work, and cabinets filled with first-aid kits of every size and description.

Mr. Miller points out that it is law for every business to have a first-aid kit and that every business, no matter how small, have someone on staff with a St. John Ambulance certificate or equivalent.

He can and does supply kits which meet governmental requirements.

For instance, a kit for a business with not more than 15 employees costs about $50. It contains one card of safety pins, 24 adhesive dressings, 12 sterile gauze pads, four rolls of two-inch bandage, four rolls of four-inch bandage, four sterile pads which can be used for pressure dressings, six triangular bandages, two rolls of plain splint padding, and one roll-up splint.

That's a lot of equipment for $50, he says, but it could be worth many times that amount in case of an emergency on the job.

"The idea for this business sort of sprang from the St. John," Mr. Miller said.

"I don't intend to retire on the money I make because it isn't a lot, but there is a need for this kind of thing and if it is needed, I can supply it."

Mr. Miller has first-aid kits for many applications such as the ones he has just supplied to the hockey arenas. He also has an in-car "SOS" kit in a nylon bag with everything from a full first-aid kit to flares, jumper cables and a flashlight with fresh batteries.

"I don't care if they buy it from me," he says, "but the many small business and industrial plants locating in Milton should have first-aid equipment which meets Workers' Compensation Board regulations. If they don't, a ruling by the WCB could prove costly."
