Co-op education growing in popularity

Cooperative education in the Halton Board of Education system has doubled over the last four years and is expected to continue growing.

Aryeh Gitterman, coordinator of guidance and cooperative education, said the number of students participating in the 17 secondary schools is expected to climb from 950 now to more than 1,000 in the fall.

Although cooperative education is encouraged by teachers, Mr. Gitterman said it is largely the recommendation of students who have gone through the program that is responsible for the growing popularity.

Another trend, he said, is the growing use of cooperative education for students in the advanced academic stream, rather than just those in technical.

Mr. Gitterman said cooperative education is possible with almost every subject from the traditional technical areas through sciences, English, accounting and dramatic arts.

There are 850 potential training sites for cooperative education. More employers are asking for cooperative education students than are available, he added.

Employers are obligated to give some training to the students and monitor their progress. In addition, they must provide jobs that have a relevant education component to the student.

For the employer, the student is an extra person helping. Mr. Gitterman said the student's eagerness to work and learn adds a different dimension to the workplace. Since they are usually not paid, there is no out-of-pocket cost for the employer.

The employer may choose to use the student on a short-term project that, although desired, may not be done without the student.

"One more person can make a difference in a small business", he said.

Since the student isn't an employee, he added, there is a different relationship with the employer.

The program is for students in Grade 11 and 12 where "rounding is a goal".

To a lesser extent cooperative education is used for younger students. The idea is to show relevance, hence reduce the likelihood of a child dropping out. In this case, the target group is the 14 and 15 year olds.
