Organ donations

From ORGAN RES agreed to donate Kevin's organs. Because of their thoughtfulness in the face of their grief, two children received Kevin's kidneys and two others had their sight restored through corneal transplants. (One individual can potentially give the gift of life to seven people). While nothing will ever replace the loss of their loved one, this generous gesture to others in need helped ease their sorrows. In a very real way, Kevin lives on through the lives that were saved.

Although 200,000 Canadians die each year, only three deaths in every 100 occur in a way that allows vital organ donation. Much depends on organ size, blood match, age of the donor, and the length of time an organ can be stored. The lungs and livers of donors, for example, must closely match the size of the recipients' organs.

Donor age ranges vary: any age for eyes, one year to 75 years for kidneys, 1-55 for lungs and livers, and 1-45 for hearts.

Skin, which is used as a temporary dressing for burns patients, can be stored indefinitely in a freezer and corneas can be taken from the body up to 12 hours after the heart stops and stored up to two days. Kidneys can be stored up to 48 hours, livers eight and hearts six. Lungs can be preserved for up to five hours, but only one in 20 is suitable for transplantation because of pulmonary complications arising from the trauma of brain death.

It is important for potential donors to inform their family, doctor and executor of their desire to donate their organs. Families are reassured that the physician treating the dying patient is not part of the retrieval and transplant team. (Often families are concerned about a conflict of interest).

Doctors, who would suggest organ transplantation only after brain death has occurred, are frequently reluctant to bring up the subject for fear of upsetting the grieving family.

Organs are removed only if a matching recipient is available and the surgical procedures cause no visible disfigurement of the body.

For more information (and donor cards for non-drivers), write to: Transplant International (Canada), 339 Windemere Road, London, Ontario, L6A 5A5.
