

Heat pumps are making a comeback

The heat pump has the apparently contradictory abilities to heat your house in winter and cool it in summer. When it does this successfully, it does so with energy efficiency unmatched by a conventional furnace/air conditioner combination.

In the early 70s, when the energy crisis hit, heat pumps surged in popularity. Heat pumps have been expensive to buy, and some early models were not overly reliable. So when the energy crunch let up, somewhat, their popularity surged the other way.

The principle of the heat pump, however, is sound. Instead of burning something, the heat pump uses energy — usually electrical — to run a motor which produces coolness inside your home in the summer, exactly the way your refrigerator motor does. The refrigerator motor, you'll have noticed, also produces heat. With the refrigerator the coolness is always inside and the heat outside.

With a heat pump the process in winter is reversed — heat inside, coolness outside.

Even the highest efficiency conventional furnace wastes a lot of energy in the process of burning a fuel to heat your home. The heat pump motor wastes very little.

Rose Titus is a marketing information manager with IQC, Canada's largest manufacturer of heating and cooling equipment.

She makes this point, "Today's heat pumps have established excellent records for reliability. With the exception of those living in the coldest part of Canada, any homeowner should investigate the heat pump alternative. You get both heating and cooling functions in one. Through the years the energy saving could well make the investment worthwhile."
