Volunteer experience valued by employers

Have you ever applied for a job, only to be told that you didn't have the necessary experience?

Have you ever felt apprehensive about making a career change?

Are you concerned about having the skills necessary to find a good job after working at home raising a family for several years?

Have you ever considered doing volunteer work as a way of learning new skills, sharpening rusty skills, trying out a career option, or gaining experience?

Today's volunteers are involved at every level of activity in health and social services, education and recreation, religious and political organizations. Lack of experience is not a barrier to most volunteer opportunities.

In fact, most volunteers learn their jobs on the job. Employers take volunteer work seriously, considering it real experience and not just a hobby.

It's impossible to overestimate the importance of volunteers to our community. Many groups, agencies, organizations and institutions offering essential services to our community would have to radically reduce programs, or simply shut their doors if people didn't volunteer their time, energy, and enthusiasm.

What this means for you is the opportunity to explore:

- If you've never worked with children, one of several agencies could use your help with its preschool programs.

- If you'd like to develop managerial and administrative skills, consider participating on a board of directors or committee.

- If you would like to try teaching, consider tutoring in a literacy training program, or sharing your hobby, craft or artwork with others.

- If you've ever thought about working in corrections, or with computers, or in social services, opportunities abound to try your hand. Find out what the field is all about. Develop skills and gain experience, and not incidentally, give your help to the community of which you are a part.

For more information about these and other volunteer opportunities, call the Milton Volunteer Centre at 876-4756. The Milton Volunteer Centre is a program of the Halton Social Planning Council.
