

First Milton students complete anti-drug course

By KAREN SMITH

About 100 Milton students are on their way to drug-free lives now that they have completed a new program run by Halton Regional Police.

Grade 6 students at Holy Rosary and St. Peter's schools graduated from the Drug Abuse Resistance Education (DARE) program yesterday.

"If you take drugs, you're wrong," Holy Rosary student Ryan Chin told the audience of parents at the school. "That's why I'm here today, to make a commitment to never take drugs."

Full-time DARE instructor constable Susan Delaney, who received a standing ovation for her work, has spent one day a week for the last four months in the classroom educating students about the effects of drugs and how to say no.

"You've got to practise what you've learned," she told the students. "If you feel good about yourself, you can do anything. But you've got to do it drug free. Don't do it for me, do it for yourself."

Halton Regional Police Chief James Harding had some words for the program graduates as well.

"You are actually standing on guard for the well being of the nation," he said. "The future is in your hands."

Sergeant Dave Gwilliams, co-ordinator of DARE, said the program will expand next fall to include 64 classes with about 1,500 students from various Halton schools.

"Our goal is to get the program in every school in Halton," he added.

He could not confirm what schools in Milton will participate in September.

The 17-week program began as a pilot project in Oakville last year. It expanded in February this year to include the two Milton schools as well as schools in Burlington.

Halton is the second region in Canada to have the program (the first was in British Columbia). DARE originated in the United States, where it is in place in every state and mandatory in some.
