Board may cut tuitions to special schools

Halton Board of Education's finance committee will recommend cutting a program which pays for students to attend special schools outside Halton.

The committee is suggesting the board not accept any new application for tuition fees for students to attend schools including the National Ballet School, the Nation Ski School and other arts institutions.

Presently 43 students — 40 secondary and 3 elementary — attend specialized schools outside Halton.

A study by school services superintendent Betty Moore showed the board's cost of their education is now $162,000 which would be saved if the tuition fee program wasn't in place.

Trustees did hear however, that while no new applications will be accepted, those students currently in programs will be allowed to complete their programs.

These recommendations will come from a finance sub-committee which will be re-established. The sub-committee was originally set up last summer to bring board budgets in line with inflation rates and changing service delivery to achieve the goal.

The sub-committee included volunteer trustees and was chaired by trustee Cheryl Reid. Although trustee Penny Siebert voted against continuing the committee because its terms of reference weren't set up by the finance committee, the recommendation to continue will go to the board.
