Some car stereos can cause hearing loss

from TURN DOWN on page 11

ing occurring immediately after exposure to high noise levels. I've experienced it after several hours in a noisy restaurant or concert hall. My ears felt "dull" and I notice a ringing sound. Then, after a few hours, my hearing seemed to return to normal. When this type of noise exposure occurs repeatedly, the temporary loss becomes permanent.

Noise destroys our hearing slowly and painlessly. The damage occurs within the inner ear where thousands of sensory receptor cells (called hair cells) are located. Normally, these hair cells act to pick up sound vibrations and transmit the signal along nerve pathways to the brain. Loud noises damage and eventually destroy these hair cells, thus impeding the transmission of sounds to the brain. With time, more and more hair cells are destroyed, and the hearing loss worsens. Because nerve damage cannot be treated medically, a noise-induced hearing loss is permanent.

What can we all do to minimize the hazards of noise? The most obvious solution is to avoid it. If like most of us, however, you can't resist turning up your stereo, or using power tools, or going snowmobiling, then follow a few precautions.

Firstly, be aware of unsafe noise levels. For example, if you must raise your voice in order to talk to someone less than two feet away from you, then the surrounding noise is loud enough to potentially damage your hearing.

Likewise, if someone else can hear the music on your Walkman, then you have the volume too high. Some car stereos are capable of producing sound intensity levels that will damage your hearing within minutes.

Remember, the louder the noise, the less time it takes to cause a permanent hearing loss. Therefore, another good precaution is to minimize the length of time you're exposed to high noise levels.

Finally, the best protection is in the form of commercial ear plugs or muffs. It's a good idea to purchase some form of hearing protection that you can use when mowing the grass or going to a rock concert. Hearing protection allows you to enjoy noisy activities without the risk of permanent damage.

Hopefully, with an increased awareness of the hazards of noise, we can all make the effort to protect our hearing. Let's all try to minimize our contribution to the ever-growing amount of noise pollution.
