New working women's program in place

Ontario has announced financial help for employers who want to give female staff training opportunities in trade, technology and operations.

The province will pay up to 50 per cent of costs for specified training to help women in traditional jobs gain a wider exposure to the job market. In the program, women keep their normal jobs while taking 34 days of classroom sessions, shop training and work placement.

They then return to their home positions to compete for jobs in trade and technology when they arise.

The program is based on the successful Bridges to Equity program developed by the City of Toronto.

For more information about how to get involved with the Technical Stream Mobility/Bridges to Equity initiative, contact the Ontario Skills Manager at Sheridan College in Oakville.
