Halton police association slams night closing of five stations

Members of the Halton Regional Police Association have stated they fear police station closures will jeopardize public safety.

"Our members are concerned that public safety will be compromised by the closures," said Paul LaCourse, administrator of the association, which represents more than 500 police officers and civilian workers.

"Police stations represent safe havens to people in immediate need or danger. The people that go to the stations in the middle of the night are not doing so just to make inquiries. They are usually trying to find refuge, or fleeing from a situation which is causing them fear."

The Halton Regional Police Services Board announced last week that, as a cost-saving measure, the hours police buildings are open to the public will be restricted sometime in the new year.

Milton's police station will be closed to the public at night and on weekends, ending the building's current 24-hour, seven-day-a-week availability.

Located across from Town Hall, the 12 Division station will only be open Monday to Friday from 8 a.m. to 4 p.m. due to provincial government funding cutbacks.

In previous years, Milton's station has been closed to the public during evening hours.

Mr. LaCourse said the association has shown other methods of saving funds. "Our members fully support the need to save taxpayers' money. We have suggested a number of ways to the police services board to reduce expenses without compromising public safety."

To minimize the impact, the board indicated Milton's station will return to use of a telephone system installed at the entrance. The public will have direct access to a staff sergeant within the building or to the police service's radio communications centre.
