

Few turn out for meeting

very serious statement but this is a very serious matter."

Mr. Field said the new law contradicts "the right of each one of us to be regarded as the equal of every other citizen before or under the law."

During his 90-minute presentation, he remarked on how there has been no public forum to discuss the ongoing immigration problems in Canada, and how he is frustrated over bilingualism being forced on Canadians as an official policy, as well as taxpayer-funded multiculturalism.

"Now we know it (multiculturalism) means special laws for special people and the funding of causes which are often in the worst interests of Canada."

He added that government-funded multiculturalism creates the ability to start political groups which divide and separate Canadians.

"I am not a politician and this is not a political group by any means. We are a voice of freedom."

"Above all, we encourage all Canadians, regardless of origin, to stand and be counted. 'Political correctness' is the refuge of cowards and charlatans. People who use such tactics do not understand the obligations and responsibilities of a free and open democratic society."

Halton Multiculturalism Council President Willie Campos said that while the employment equity law is not perfect, he does agree with the intention — to correct job discrimination that has gone on in the past.

"With regards to multiculturalism, our role at the council is to help people from all groups and backgrounds, in business matters and otherwise," said Mr. Campos, who added that bilingualism should be considered a privilege and not a burden.

"This group (Voice of Canadians Committee) says these policies separate Canadians, but it is in fact they who wish to divide us through their underlying bigotry."

Mr. Field told the 14 local residents in attendance that many people share the group's concerns regarding government policies, but will be reluctant to attend similar meetings for fear of being cast as racists or right wing activists by coworkers and friends.

He added the group has had trouble booking halls for meetings in other communities and has been unable to gain media attention. The organization presently includes 200 members.

Mr. Field is the sole financial supporter.

Registration officer Steve Edger voiced his optimism over the group's potential and ability to create change. "This is only the beginning. The Voice of Canadians Committee will become a world-wide organization, and you're going to look back on the day you joined with pride," Mr. Edger predicted.

Mr. Field said the group will continue to seek support throughout the province in meetings and public debates, and will attempt to gain media attention to voice their concerns.

"I'm putting my money where my mouth is. We will be silent no longer. We're mad as hell and we're not going to take it anymore," said Mr. Field.
