

Low-voltage lighting sparkles during the night

When the sun sets and evening descends, many homeowners automatically move from their decks and patios back into their homes. However, the outdoors can be just as enjoyable at night, particularly if you're one of the growing number of people who own a low-voltage outdoor lighting system.

"A set of low-voltage lights on your deck can extend your fun well past sunset," says Phil Kinzer, marketing manager for Intermatic Malibu.

"Low-voltage lights are also ideal for use around gardens, paths and walks, as well as for adding a dramatic sparkle to bushes, planters, fountains and other objects."

Each low-voltage lighting set contains several fixtures, a power pack that converts standard 120-volt house current to a safe 12 volts and a length of low-voltage cable. In addition to adding a degree of beauty, the lights can help enhance safety and security around your home and yard.

The wide selection of low-voltage lighting fixtures available is designed to suit any taste. Besides the many models developed specifically for use decks, the choices include traditional tier, mushroom, well and floodlight models, plus bollard, globe, carriage and crystal lights.

Another alternative is the revolutionary convertible light, which enables users to quickly change the fixture from a tier light to a floodlight and vice versa.

Installing a set of low-voltage lights makes a great do-it-yourself project. In fact, an average set, including the power pack and cable, can be installed in about an hour using ordinary hand tools. Low-voltage lights are also economical to operate; a typical six-light set uses less electricity than a 75-watt bulb.

Low-voltage lighting systems can be obtained at full-service retailers, hardware stores, home centres, discount outlets, and lawn and garden centres.
