Shelter use is increasing

• from REPORT on page 1
 abused women.

"The notion is that (the women) will become more comfortable with the police," he explained.

Scheduled weekly visits of three or four hours will allow the officers to meet with women individually to discuss their personal circumstances and offer police support.

Ms Greer also believes the visits will help women learn just what the police can or cannot do to help them.

The liaison program demonstrates a "new level of sensitivity" to domestic assaults, said Chief Campbell.

"We are treating them differently now. We have been for several years."

Although he was reluctant to discuss the details of the provincial report without reading the full document, Chief Campbell said he was reassured to hear politicians expressing their support for shelters and support services.
