Board wants your opinion

The Halton Board of Education is going to get into the public relations business.

Board trustees heard a proposal from board staff last Thursday on conducting a public opinion survey in Halton in March. The survey would serve, among other things, as a useful tool in presenting "positive perceptions of education to the public."

The telephone survey, taking eight months to plan, conduct and analyze, would be carried out by trained volunteers between the hours of 5.30 p.m. and 9.30 p.m., said Peter Noble, of the board's employee services department.

The telephone interview takes approximately 15 to 20 minutes and asks about 50 to 60 questions on opinions about the quality of education in Halton. The survey will be taken from a random sample of public school ratepayers.

Other objectives of the survey besides providing a "positive image" of the school system, are to provide a data base for longrange planning, and to identify concerns about public education.

Volunteers are being used to conduct the survey, said Mr. Noble because "there is a public relations benefit generated by utilizing volunteers"; and "although the project and method is novel in education, it has high potential for sparking public interest."

Trustees asked for detailed cost figures of the survey.
