Halton garbage to New York
Export of Halton's garbage to Occidental Chemical in Niagara Falls, New York may still become a reality, in spite of strong regional opposition to the proposal last year.
The region's solid waste management committee rejected staff's request this week for reconsideration of the export option, but the planning and public works committee decided last Wednesday to get more information on the situation to consider the proposal at its next meeting on Dec. 12.
Reconsideration is necessary because it doesn't appear Halton will have its new landfill facility in operation before the Burlington landfill site reaches capacity in 1987.
Speaking "optimistically", chief administrative officer Dennis Perlin estimates the new site won't be ready until 1988. The Burlington site, already into its second interim expansion, cannot be engineered to increase its capacity.
One regional councillor who has had a change of heart on the export option is Burlington's Pat McLaughlin. He was strongly opposed to exporting garbage to the U.S. when the proposal was before council in the spring, but says Occidental is offering a very good deal right now.

New EFW plant
Another energy-from-waste (EFW) plant proposal has been made to Halton Region by a private company.
But this latest proposal, from Enercan, a Toronto company, is different from any of the other EFW proposals the region has seen.
Enercan's proposal is to build and operate a plant right on the landfill site, which would recover fuel from the garbage and recycle corrugated paper, metals, and if the market demand is there, would recover glass.
The fuel would initially be sold to the Occidental Chemical energy-from-waste plant in Niagara Falls, New York, and then to other customers as they become available.
Enercan would build its Enercycle plant at the Halton Burlington landfill site and then move it to wherever the next site is located, once the Burlington dump is closed. The cost for transporting the plant is $750,000 a cost which would be borne by the region.
Joe Kennedy, Enercan vice-president and a Halton resident, appeared before Monday's solid waste management committee to present his company's proposal.
"The main objective of the plant is to recover a waste fuel," he said. "We feel there are many benefits to this type of plant, perhaps better than going the energy-from-waste route."
The plant would employ six people, he added.
